Austria-Hungary and Turkey Bid
Good-bye to Germany

Turks, following fast on the heels of Austria-Hungary, have signed an armistice and both may have been accommodated before this shall have been printed, whether they shall be or not is a question of little practical moment. Selfishness has been militarily important. Germany remains the only enemy having the will in the power to inflict anything like an effective retaliatory attack upon us. While at the very beginning of this country's entrance into the war, we sought to isolate the Germans, and then the military masses of Germany. The casting out of allies is a far-reaching and tragic picture. Germans have remained an effective enemy, and Germans are showing increasing signs of a determination to act independently of its military masters. It is evident that they are fast losing their authority over the course of events. There is probably more plausibility in the news that comes to us of Germans than in that which comes to us from the battlefield of France and Belgium and the news we get out of Germany uniformly indicate that the masses of the German people have awakened to a full consciousness of defeat, and that it is recognition to the consequences of an unconditional surrender of the fact. The value of such motifs as those may be was in no way in maintaining the feeling of hope that there was evidently latent in the German people.

Germany, Germany, Germany.—Germany.

Germany, Germany, Germany.

Germany, Germany, Germany.
